NORWAY, MAINE

From Whiting's Column

In Boston Herald of September 21

Let's turn aside a few moments from primaries, politics, personalities, labor laws, hot words and cold consequences, ten-centenary parades, high seas, sea feet, pageantry, reviewing stands, engraved invitations, official luncheons, state flags, ten-centenary flags, candidates, political parties, campaign funds, blacked hopes, subways, racketeers, murders, hot weather and other matters more or less necessary and more or less wearing on the nerves. Let's go up to—down to—Maine, without the strain song. Let's go and see what Mellicie Dunham is doing.

Remember Mellicie? This plain, old-fashioned Maine maker of snowshoes, fiddler and resident of one of the prettiest towns the Lord ever looked upon, Norway, Oxford County, was on the front pages not so many years ago. He got as much space as crime and trouble, as much notice as the news. He held it for quite a while. He was the centre of the stage—the news stage and the theatre stage. People paid money to go to theatres to see him and hear him. They sat back in their seats and got more happiness out of his squeaking fiddle bow than they had had for a long time.

Dramatists have a way of putting what they call "comedy" relief into tense situations. Even Shakespeare did it. The idea is that the human nerves need something soft once in a while, partly to save them from overstrain, partly to make the horrors more so by contrast. It's a simple rule, and natural enough. Nature does it, planting a nodding blossom among the weeds. Putting a gay butterfly among the thistles.

The real reason folks welcomed Mellicie Dunham was because he was relief. Not comedy relief, but human relief. Here was a wholesome note. He brought back out of the dim mists of memory or materialized from dreams, the essential simplicities of life. He and "Gram" were real folks. He did and he was what we all think about. Clean stuff. He was like a roadside spring of clear delight after miles of plodding in the dust and dirt. He was like a star shining in a dark night. He was shining after dark. Of course people were relieved.

Mellicie has faded out of the big news picture. He plays around at country affairs now and then and sometimes at the theatres—lately at Portland; and the folks in his home town know him. He always did; for he went back there and he was about the same old Mellicie coming back that he was when he left out on that amazing adventure which took him across the continent to the top of the high and send him smiling and fiddling into places where he had never dreamed to go. He's real in Norway.

Quite a while ago the house he and Gram lived in burned down. We got used to fires in the city. A fire alarm bell doesn't mean much to most of us. We expect the fire department to come to it. It won't happen to our house, or anyway won't wreck all our have. Besides, there's insurance. When they come to a house in the country, there are a few miles from the village or town, it's different from a city fire. It means disaster. Besides these old country houses, farm houses, village houses are a human sort of thing. They are lived in a lot. They are full of ghosts—pleasant ghosts. It takes years to build a farm house and get everything into it that has to be in it. Years, and children, and old folks, and a little chaos, and lilacs, and Sweet William, and hens, and a sag or two in the walls and creaking floors, and those things.

No one down this way gave much thought to the fire at Mellicie's house. It had some news value, and readers passed a moment. "Mellicie Dunham? Oh, yes, he was that old Maine fiddler—the man that Henry Ford picked up on a New England road. I too had a fire," said that about all. Then we forgot all about it.

It was more than that for Mellicie and Gram. This gallanting around the world, standing up with your fiddle in playhouses, seeing reporters, listening to applause, eating queer stuff in hotels, riding in trains and trolley cars and taxis—all right enough for a good fun, but getting back to the old house on the side road off from Norway, Oxford County, Maine, was the real thing. Going back home. Men dream of that. Back home. We have had a letter from a friend in Norway, Oxford County. It tells us about what's been happening in Mellicie's affairs. A new house is being built and furnished. It was what was the old place burned, where Mellicie and Gram have lived ever since they were married more than 50 years ago, and they saved about nothing but their lives—they did save the ribbons, and Henry Ford's letters. All the old furniture, that had marks of half a century, together, all the little souvenirs collected, these were burned. Not far from the house, the grounds, is a sort of camp, where Mellicie steamed and shaped the snowshoes that Peary wore when he discovered the north pole. Mellicie and Gram lived in that camp. Now they are fixing up a new house, four rooms downstairs and two upstairs.

Lots of people think Mellicie is rich now. They do a little calculating, multiplying what they think was his weekly show salary by the number of weeks they think he got it, and so they suppose he has a lot of money. Well, Mellicie is a generous man. He's just made that way. He isn't rich. He's just happy, has a lot of friends, likes to play his fiddle and see the folks dance.

So his neighbors gave him a housewarming party around Labor Day. The home-folks—yes, we got some of the names, Mrs. Will Young, Mrs. Sol Jackson, Mrs. Mellicie Snell, Mrs. Stanley Thurston, Mrs. Albert Dion, Mrs. Amos Noble, Mrs. Reggie Dunham, Mrs. Elva Parker, Mrs. Albert Thurston, Mrs. Amos Noble, Mrs. Ruth Bradbury, Mrs. Marion Holt, Mrs. Chris Noble. The children and the men folks gathered, and there was a decoration, and brought hydrangeas. Shem's orchestra came over from West Paris and Mr. Stone played the saxophone and prompted for the dancing. Dallas Benner put up some canvas around the place to keep intruders out, and did some rope stunts. Mellicie played for the contra dances, and Mrs. Cherry Frechette, who is his granddaughter, accompanied him. They sold tickets, and there was apple pie and other things to eat. Everyone shook hands with Mellicie and Gram. The house warming brought in about $150 and that will go to buying new furniture.

So that's the latest news about Mellicie and the folks in Norway, Oxford County. That's the town where the Weary Club is, and where—Sanderson runs the Advertiser and gets a lot of news into it. Just old New England, the pie country, Mellicie Dunham's land. Maine country, down east.

The young man who applies himself to thinking with, by and by, he is amazed to find how much there is to think about.—Otto Kahn.

White and Whole Wheat Breads—Both Wholesale, Say Scientists

That white bread is a whole wheat bread is the opinion expressed by scientists of the U. S. Department of Agriculture.

The scientists, known authorities on national problems who were consulted by the department, headed by Dr. A. T. Wigglesworth, expressed in a statement based on the scientific facts that white breads made of white flour and whole wheat flour.

Whole wheat or grain flour, which contain the bran and germ portion of the grain, have lower loaf-making capacity and are more susceptible to spoilage, so cannot be handled as easily as commercial white flour. In fact, they contain essential minerals and vitamins more roughage than white flour.

No person subsists on one food. Each food constituent is related to the body. Bread, either white or whole wheat, is always an economical source of energy and protein in any diet. The form may be left to the choice of the consumer, but it is constituted to contribute the necessary minerals, vitamins and any necessary roughage.
